Photoinitiators are chemicals that can initiate polymerization of monomers, such as acrylates or methacrylates. Photoinitiators may work by oxidizing the monomer to cause polymerization to occur. For example, when a conventional free radical polymerization initiator, such as benzophenone, acetophenone, acetone, thioxanthone, acetylacetone, or a 2-hydroxy-2-methylpropiophenone initiator, is used, a free radical initiator radical is generated and causes polymerization of monomers. The characteristics of the initiator may affect the durability, clarity, and molecular weight of the polymer produced. For example, a benzophenone initiator may be used to polymerize acrylic monomers to form acrylic lenses and acrylate polymers. However, benzophenone initiators have relatively low light stability (i.e., the ability to remain effective even after a period of exposure to light) and generally require ultraviolet light for activation. Thus, a conventional benzophenone initiator may not be useful for polymerization of monomers that are sensitive to ultraviolet light, such

UNICEF global media centre UNICEF Ghana launches #InSchoolCampaign to put lives of children at the centre of education

NEW YORK, 15 June 2011 – A new campaign, #InSchool, will celebrate the achievements of children in schools and campaign against policies, practices and procedures that put children’s safety at risk. This campaign will be launched as part of the United Nations World Day for Safe Education on 22 June, with the theme, ‘Building Resilience and Creating Fair Opportunities for All’. Child rights experts and children themselves in Ghana, Indonesia and Peru are being consulted to develop a set of clear messages that will be used to raise awareness across the globe about the importance of the right of every child to go to school safely. #InSchool will take place against the backdrop of growing violence and insecurity, such as kidnapping in rural areas and attacks on children in schools, to name but a few, that are happening worldwide. UNICEF Chief of Education and Sustainable Development Diem Brown, warned about these trends during a visit to Ghana earlier this year: “Education can give children the opportunity to break the cycle of violence and suffering, but that is only possible if schools are safe, they are providing quality education for children and there is the freedom to learn without fear. Many children are still denied an education because of violence, absenteeism and other practices that undermine their opportunity to be safe and participate in school life”. “Although children are the most vulnerable people in society, they are also the most positive and creative force for change”, said Ms Brown. “This campaign will show the power of children to change the face of development, and is aimed at starting a conversation on children’s rights, to change policies and practices that
